

I've known about child labor, but there is nothing like it when you get to see it firsthand. Children as young as five years old, collecting wood to sell to the market so that they can help their families feed themselves. As I worked and travelled around Bangladesh, I noticed children out of the schools, on the streets working and behaving as adults and not as the children who should be playing and carefree. Too many families cannot afford to send their children to school because they cannot afford to purchase books and school supplies, and so the project done by DCI is of tremendous value to these children's future. DCI gives them the opportunity to get an education and helps them find a job after completing school so that they can have a better opportunity of pulling themselves out of poverty. I am glad to have been introduced to DCI, and I am committed to help them in their cause of educating children and creating a better environment for them.

Danita Topcagic
Peace Fellow - Advocacy Project
DCI Volunteer